Malta's Property Market: Four Decades of Change

This year, Frank Salt Property News (FSPN) marks its 40th anniversary and no publication has tracked Malta's property market as closely, issue by issue, since 1986.

When the first edition rolled off the press that year, it looked nothing like other property supplements of the time. FSPN was a three-colour tabloid, printed at a time when finding a home meant scanning a few column inches of the classifieds or stopping to read physically typed cards, taped inside an estate agent's office window. In most instances, it meant hearing from a close neighbour about a house, two streets over, that was quietly put up for sale. A photograph, if there was one at all, was small and grainy, and it was often of no more than a single room or a front door. Buyers worked with what they could see and who they knew, which meant they searched close to home, within their own town or the one adjacent, because that was the reach of the only information available to them.

Forty years on, almost none of that holds true. Property marketing such as Frank Salt Property News now spans print and digital and listings carry professional photography, drone shots, video walkthroughs, interactive tours and 3D floor plans, viewed instantly on a phone rather than searched for in a newspaper. That shift mirrors a deeper change in the market itself.

Demand has grown steadily and has consistently outpaced supply, particularly for well-located apartments, pushing prices upward in a way the market of 1986 never experienced. The buyer base has changed just as much: the local market now comprises a healthy mix of first-time buyers, people upgrading their homes and buy-to-let investors, a contrast to the "home for life" mentality that prevailed back then.

Decisions today are driven by value, lifestyle and investment potential rather than proximity alone, an openness that has developed quickly over the last ten to fifteen years. There has also been phenomenal interest in Gozo and the south of Malta, with both locations increasingly recognised for their long-term potential. Buy-to-let purchases for long lets have grown substantially in that time and properties themselves have generally become smaller: a reflection of land scarcity, mounting construction costs and changing household needs, with apartments now focusing on efficiency rather than being expansive.

Malta's accession to the EU in 2004, in conjunction with the residence and citizenship schemes that followed, opened the market to a far wider pool of international buyers and residents than what existed back in 1986. Foreign interest has grown into a defining feature of the market, with many buyers drawn by the country's tax and business environment alongside its lifestyle appeal. That momentum has continued to strengthen, supported by newly released tourism figures. Malta closed 2025 with just over four million inbound tourists, an increase of almost 13% compared with the previous year. Growth accelerated in 2026, with 1.6 million inbound tourists recorded during the first five months of the year, up 18% over the same period in 2025.

Perhaps the clearest sign of how far the market has moved is the short-let sector. It barely existed a few years ago but today, according to the National Statistics Office, roughly a third of tourists visiting Malta staying in short-let accommodation rather than hotels. Malta Holiday Lets, our short lets division, has seen revenue rise by 64% in the first four months of 2026 alone, signalling a shift that would have seemed unimaginable to the market that Frank Salt Property News first reported on in 1986.

That same momentum is evident on the sales side of the market. Promise-of-sale agreements were up 23% in March 2026 alone and residential prices rose 6% year-on-year in the first quarter of 2026. Now, four decades on from a market that once relied on classifieds and word of mouth referrals, demand hasn't just survived the shift. It has thrived because of it.

That growth is what will keep shaping the next forty years: not only new buyers and new tools, but also new pressure on available land and price. What won't change is our absolute commitment to the people navigating it. The same expert guidance, knowledge, expertise and personal attention that has stood behind every issue since 1986 is now reaching a wider, more diverse client base than ever before.
